Keymaker In a little-noticed ruling, a federal judge in Phoenix today struck down the law that criminalized "striking" a police officer while unarmed. Yesterday, we released a video that challenged the absurdity of that law, in which a man – unarmed, mind you – was charged with "striking" a police officer even though he had done nothing more than stand in the middle of a street. Today, the ruling made it clear that the law is unconstitutional. "Given the broad textual coverage of the phrase 'without provocation,' . . . as well as the plain meaning of the words used, it cannot be seriously argued that the phrase 'without provocation' has any plain and unambiguous meaning," writes U.S. District Judge Neil Wake. Nor is it "fair and reasonable," he adds, to construe "the phrase to preclude . . . acts simply because they occurred while the person was armed." The law, he adds, "is unconstitutionally overbroad." "It is simply without foundation and should be constitutionally invalidated." Reasoning that a person "may lawfully use physical force to resist an unlawful arrest," the law simply criminalizes "striking" a police officer when the officer is engaged in the performance of his or her duties. However, a person "may not, under the circumstances, intentionally place a person in reasonable apprehension of imminent physical injury." Wake ruled that the law constitutes a blanket prohibition on conduct that may otherwise be permissible under the law. "There is no plausible explanation for the legislature's use of the phrase ♦ 595f342e71
