is an app that gives a windows on some of the most fascinating areas of virtual reality, specifically anthropology. The app, released in early April for iOS devices, is a free download. Jill 'Zingerman' Davis is well known on the VR and gaming scenes as the "dipping lady." Recently, she was asked by Oculus who she would want to be stranded on a desert island with. Here's what she said: Let's see. I think I'd definitely want someone along who could communicate (in whatever languages they know of) with them, to make an introduction. Even if I already knew what they were like, there would just be so much to talk about. Perhaps a kid? I could teach him some things, and guide him on an adventure on the island's geology. Then we could die laughing together. If there are humans on the island (or if I find a real haunted island) I'd want one man and one woman. For me, I'd want a male with dark hair or long hair (my hair is naturally a sandy brown), and a female with brown eyes. They would have to be interesting and inspiring. Paul Sciarra with the group Breakout's crew specifically chose Jill to depict her from Spawned: We started the project back in January when we met some friends through the virtual reality group called Breakout. A fellow named Paul Sciarra who works for the San Francisco Bay Area Public Art Commission put us in touch with Jill Davis, an artist who has had work in the past displayed at the Exploratorium in San Francisco. It was through her that Breakout was created. I love San Francisco and the enormous amount of artists, programmers, scientists, and other innovators who live there. So, the city gave us the perfect start. Jill Davis is another artist who works in the industry within San Francisco. She is very articulate and told us she couldn't find a female with whom she would be willing to go on a desert island-and then she happened to land us in the Breakout group! Breakout was founded in 2013 by Ryan McNulty along with his wife Christine. The group began as a virtual reality and 360 video group but quickly branched out into many other interests and media: When VR first took off there were lots of different ideas of what it could be. One day we
